How To Make A Princess Seam Without A Pattern

By: Onnari

http://www.burdastyle.com/techniques/how-to-make-a-princess-sea

This is a tip on how you can cut a princess seam without using a pattern.

Step 1 — Marking out measurements

The labels 'A', 'E' and 'B' stand for the Apex(nipple or highest point of the bust), Empire (that area under the bust, normally measured from the top of the shoulder to the underbust i.e. where your bra rests), and Bodice (your belly button, normally measured from your shoulder to belly button) The determined width would read as technical if I explain it, so I would just advice that you add about 12" to half your bust line measurement and if you are making a dress, add to your hip measurement. If you are bigger however, feel free to add incremental inches so you don't make errors and waste your fabric. Fold your fabric in two: measurements used here - bust(34), bodice(17 x 26), empire(27)

Step 2 — Marking the apex

At the apex, measure out the 'gap' from one apex to the other. Here I used 8" as that is my perfect fit or rather 'gap' :-) so you are seeing 4.5" because the extra 0.5" makes for seam allowance.

Step 3 — Marking the bodice

At the bodice, measure out the same 'perfect fit gap', here I used 6". As you

Step 4 — Connecting the dots: from bodice to apex

Connect the markings from bodice to apex

Step 5 — The princess curve

now, I made different curves so you determine how high or low you would prefer your princess seams. Here we would make use of the lowest one (the curve with the arrows). Note that the lower the curve, the pointier the curve at the apex.

Step 6 — The princess curve - a

Step 7 — Creating your princess curve

connect the dots all the way to the apex, following whichever curve you want

BurdaStyle

How To Make A Princess Seam Without A Pattern